Silent reading is a two-step process involving the recognition and interpretation of printed words. In achieving most purposes, it is more efficient than oral reading. The need for silent reading increases as children grow older and work independently in personal reading and study. Independence in reading should be achieved as early as possible. A person who fails to develop the ability to read with ease and understanding turns to other ways of gaining information, such as motion pictures, televisions, or other people. The ability to read rapidly for meaning is an important factor in the rate of learning. It becomes more important as demands for additional reading are at each succeeding level of school and in adult
